From the Principals:

We occasionally get requests from families asking for work that their child can take with them while they will be away on a family trip. We thought it would be worth sharing our school policy related to that. First, we remind families that maintaining good school attendance is important. When emergencies arise and your child is not able to be in school, it is not our practice to provide the work that they will miss. When children don't receive the instruction that goes with the work, they can become frustrated and defeated. What we can do, however, is provide a list of educational activities that they can interact with to continue learning while away from school. These activities will vary slightly from grade to grade, and teacher to teacher, but are likely to include:

Writing-we encourage your child to keep a detailed record of their adventures and write a lot.

Reading-the most important thing a learner can do is continue to read books that are just right for them.

Visit appropriate websites-there are numerous websites that teachers use with students in class and as homework that we can encourage students to engage with.

Practicing basic skills-all children can benefit from practicing math facts, whether addition, subtraction or challenging themselves with multiplication and division. We will work to provide instruction on skills missed when they return to the classroom.
