Use the passage below to answer this question.

When the United States was young, settlers who wanted more land went west. Today, when people want more space, they leave the city and move to the suburbs. A suburb is a community of homes located at the edge of a city. Almost half of all people in the United states now live in suburbs.

In the 1880s, streetcars and later, commuter trains, improved travel out of cities. People could live in towns or villages and travel by trolley or train to and from city jobs.

Since the 1940s, roads and highways have become bigger and better. Real estate developers have built large clusters of homes on what was once open land or farmland. Many families have moved into these homes in the suburbs looking for quiet, friendly communities where people know and look out for each other.
