The field of journalism prepares students for professional careers in newspapers, magazines, television, radio, news agencies, publishing and public information services. Occupations can be found in a variety of settings including business, education, government and non-profit sectors of the market. The field is sometimes referred to as the “communications industry.” In today’s market, the ability to communicate not only involves speaking, writing and reading, but also requires the journalist to understand and utilize multimedia technology required to distribute stories across digital delivery platforms. Skills in verbal and written communication are the most sought after characteristics employers need and want.
