Dramatic Avalanches Reveals Oldest Frozen Humanoid Ever Found In Himalayan Mountains

A group of climbers on an expedition in the Himalayan Mountains were shocked when they stumbled upon a group of caverns that seem to have recently surfaced after a series of dramatic avalanches. The team of Norwegian and Swedish mountaineers discovered the remains of a humanoid male from the Paleolithic era.

The discovery marks the oldest sign of human life ever found in the region. The primary analysis of the skeletons reveals the bones belong to an adult male Homo habilis—believed to have lived between 1.44 and 2.33 million years ago. The remains are remarkably well preserved. Further tests and analysis are being conducted to determine the exact nature of the remains.

The site was also home to tools, including a crude stone spear, and a few badly damaged leather objects that are also being studied.

Some believe the man was part of a small group that long outlived the extinction of the majority of his species—a theory that will be solved by a carbon dating test. Regardless of the results—this opens up a new understanding of the views of the colonization of the planet by humans.

It is possible that a thorough search of the site could reveal many more artifacts and other human and animal remains, but that could take some time. The hostility of the climatic conditions in the remote location would pose major obstacles for a scientific expedition.
