

HHH Kobe Bryant

Entrance Question

If you could play only one video game for the rest of your life, what game would it be?

It started with a simple sentence a couple of decades ago.

"I... have decided to skip college and take my talents to the NBA."

From there — and after some relatively humble beginnings coming off the bench and missing key shots in the playoffs — Kobe Bryant would go on to be one of the legends of the NBA.

He's the only NBA player to have a 20-year career with one team. Kobe's raw statistics are otherworldly: Five championships, two Finals MVPs, one regular season MVP, third on the all-time career scoring list, 15 All-NBA teams, 18-time All-Star, four-time scoring champion, and the list goes on and on.

However, those stats do not define Kobe — we will remember him more as one of the game's ultimate competitors, a guy as driven as anyone who has ever laced up shoes and walked onto a court.

From when he entered the league, Kobe understood what it took to become a great player. He was driven, but he also studied film on the greats, he reached out to them and learned from them. He challenged those around him and pushed them to challenge him.

In my opinion, Kobe Bryant is on my Mount Rushmore of NBA greats of my lifetime.

Here is short video on the life and legacy of Kobe Bryant

Kobe was more than a basketball player. He was an author, movie and music producer, sports team owner, oscar and emmy winner, AAU basketball coach. He spoke several languages and learned from people in his past. Athletes and those around him called him the most motivated person that have ever been around. Here is the mindset of a winner that he was constantly preaching and practicing in his own life
